

DANIELLE PROCACCIO (b. 1972)

Danielle Procaccio is an American self-taught mixed-media artist based in New York. Her practice centers on emotionally resonant, multi-layered compositions that explore themes of memory, resilience, renewal, and the spiritual connection between humanity and the natural world. Procaccio works primarily on canvas using a combination of mediums to build rich texture and movement. Her paintings often feature bold florals, sweeping horizons, landscapes, and occasional animal subjects such as horses. These elements serve as symbols of hope, healing, and the cycles of life. Layered applications of paint, paper, and other materials create tactile depth, fusing organic, almost indigenous-inspired forms with refined contemporary aesthetics. Her work draws from vivid childhood memories and personal experiences of pain and transformation, turning observation of nature into something beautiful and universally relatable.

For Procaccio, painting is a spiritual journey. Each stage of life brings new changes and challenges, and she seeks to capture fleeting moments or feelings from the natural world—whether a blooming flower, a dramatic horizon where earth meets sky, or the quiet power of a landscape—and share them in a way that evokes emotion or distant memories in the viewer. Inspired by the idea that “the closer I get to nature, the closer I get to God” (echoing Ansel Adams) and Pablo Picasso’s notion that “art can come out of pain and sadness,” her art invites personal reflection and spiritual connection.

Her work has been exhibited widely, including art fairs like EXPO Chicago, Art Miami, Art Palm Beach, and Art Southampton. Pieces are held in private and corporate collections across the United States and internationally.

Procaccio continues to evolve her distinctive voice, creating immersive, textured works that remind us of life’s fragility and enduring beauty—no matter the season, something hopeful is always ready to emerge.
